The long mirrors, the foot-rails and the swinging doors passed from the State to return no more. Meanwhile the agitation for national prohibition had grown, culminating a few years later in the submission of the constitutional amendment outlawing the traffic in this country. That the experience of Birmingham under prohibition had a marked effect in bringing about the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment, undoubtedly is true. As that fight raged inquiries poured into this city from all parts of the country, and frequently visitors came to see for themselves how a large industrial community managed to get along without suds and swinging doors. And what these inquirers found furnished little encouragement to the wet forces, for this city thrived amazingly under arid conditions. Here, too, was found a visible and really remarkable illustration of the effect of sobriety--a huge...
